ACROSS THE WATER

From contemporary apartments to traditional villas, some of London's finest properties look out across the Thames. Rosemary Brooke explores the rich array of riverside homes

The River Thames has always been the backbone of London – the city has grown up along its bends and curves. It has been immortalised in everything from paintings to poetry, capturing the imaginations of successive generations. Once, this great river was the route of nearly all of the capital's commerce, as boats laden with goods travelled up and down its length, the waterway bustling with trade and industry. Today, London's great river is less of a busy highway and more of a place of leisure – you're more likely to see a vessel laden with tourists, rather than timber – but it remains one of the most iconic features of the capital.

There are many reasons why properties that overlook the Thames are so popular. The views, of course, are the most obvious selling point. In a city where so many buildings face squarely upon their neighbours, a river view offers a rare sense of space and freedom. The constant movement of the water as it flows towards the sea gives a feeling of life and energy, a reminder of the natural world.

As you move along the Thames from west to east, you can see how its character changes. It winds its way through some of the leafiest areas of west London, through Richmond, past Kew Gardens and on to Chiswick. Here it is possible to find that rarest of London features – a property with a good-sized garden. A five-bedroom house currently on the market with Knight Frank and Hamptons is a prime example, with a 180-foot garden that leads down to the river bank.

Set on a quiet road with ample off-street parking, Hartington Road is a detached villa with generously proportioned rooms, and an outdoor swimming pool that faces out across the Thames. The opposite bank is lined with trees, so there's a sense of being in the countryside – a rare thing in such a major capital city.

A few bends along, and the river is almost at the heart of London. On the north side lies the Chelsea Embankment, while on the south is Battersea Park and Nine Elms, the latter of which is being substantially redeveloped and transformed to create a new residential and commercial district – the US embassy recently moved there. One of the most significant recent projects on this side of the river has been the renovation of the old Battersea Power Station. Its high brick towers have long been a local landmark, and it is now an exciting mix of shops, restaurants and apartments, with more set to open. The Grade II*-listed building will that today it's such a key financial district. There's also an increasingly diverse array of residential options for those who are attracted to the area, either because of work, or by the excellent transport links.

A new development that offers something wonderfully unexpected is Wardian London. It takes its name from a 19th-century invention called the Wardian case, an early type of terrarium used to transport newly discovered plants safely from far-flung locations. Some of the prized specimens bound for Kew and other botanical gardens would likely have been brought ashore close to where these two residential towers now stand. The botanical theme even inspired the design – each floor has a wraparound terrace, so every apartment has outdoor space, which has been landscaped with a mix of ferns and succulents. The double-height lobby looks a little like a rainforest – there are fully grown trees and plants flourishing behind glass panels – and displays of plants appear throughout the building. It's modern in an ambitious way, yet inspired by the area's past – a testament to how London is always evolving. Yet however much the city's landscape may change, one thing has remained constant across the centuries – the flowing waters of the River Thames.
